Black Peppercorn Story.

For thousands of years, black pepper has been a staple ingredient all over the world. Often referred to as the "king of spices," native Indian plant "Piper nigrum." Both whole black peppercorns and ground black pepper are commonly used in cooking.

In addition to adding flavor to foods, black pepper may act as an antioxidant and offer a variety of health benefits.

Black pepper can enhance the absorption and bioavailability of certain nutrients and beneficial compounds. In particular, it may improve the absorption of curcumin – the active ingredient in the anti-inflammatory spice turmeric.

Black pepper may promote proper stomach function. Specifically, consuming black pepper stimulates the release of enzymes in your stomach and intestines that help digest fat.

Himalayan Salt Story.

The full story of authentic Himalayan salt begins over 800 million years ago when the Himalayan sea evaporated, but it wasn't discovered until Alexander the Great, when his soldiers found horses licking the stones in the area. They rood it out for themselves and shared the discovery. The flavor and healing effects of the salt were highly regarded from then on, but mined from a large scale didn't begin until the 16th century. Himalayan salt's rock salt is from the Punjab region of modern-day Pakistan. The salt often has a pinkish tint due to mineral impurities.

Himalayan salt is said to be the most beneficial as well as the cleanest salt on earth, so it does more than just make your taste better.
